

ABSTRACT

The challenges faced by refugees with disabilities who rely on wheelchairs in accessing social services and actively participating in community life in Berlin are multifaceted and demand urgent attention. This abstract delves into the complex issues surrounding their social inclusion. Refugees with disabilities face barriers related to physical accessibility, transportation, discrimination, and a lack of tailored support services. These challenges hinder their access to essential social services, including healthcare, education, employment, and housing, consequently limiting their ability to integrate into the community. Addressing these obstacles requires a comprehensive approach that encompasses policy reforms, infrastructure improvements, awareness campaigns, and collaborations among governmental agencies, NGOs, and community organizations. By prioritizing the social inclusion of refugees with disabilities, Berlin can aspire to become a more inclusive and equitable city where the rights and dignity of all residents are upheld, regardless of their backgrounds or abilities.
